Joanne Dominique Dwyer has lived in Northern New Mexico since 1980. Her poetic life began as an intuitive, self-taught writer, whose early influences were Anne Sexton, Pablo Neruda and Sherman Alexie. After a short foray in performance and slam poetry, Dwyer received her BFA in Creative Writing and Literature from The College of Santa Fe. She earned an MFA in Creative Writing from Warren Wilson's program for Writers. She was featured on the cover of The American Poetry Review, before her first poetry collection, Belle Laide, from Sarabande Books, was published in 2013. She is a recipient of a Rona Jaffe Award for Emerging Women Writers, an American Poetry Review Jerome J. Shestack prize, a Massachusetts Review Anne Halley Prize, a Pushcart nominee, and a Bread Loaf Scholar. She was also included in Best American Poetry, 2019.

Dwyer counts her experiences, supported by the Witter Bynner Foundation, working with teenagers and poetry, most recently in the small rural high school in Pecos, New Mexico, as her most meaningful engagement with poetry. For many years, Dwyer was also a visiting poet to people with dementia and Alzheimer's in memory care units. Her second book of poems, RASA, chosen by David Lehman, won the Marsh Hawk Poetry Prize and was released in May of this year.

In addition to writing poems, Dwyer loves to hike and ski and is a ceramicist.
